Who's Your Friend?

Yeah, friends, you've heard of them. If I asked you to name your friends, you would probably list off about 10-15 people you know and get along with okay. But I want you to think a little deeper. Who are your true friends? I'm talking about people you could call when you're really confused or sad about something and you need help. I'm talking about people who are there for you in good times and bad, and who you are there for, no matter what. This kind of friend may be slightly harder to think of. It takes a little more filtering to get to this kind of friend. Sure there are a lot of people that I would call acquaintances in your life, but how many real friends do you have? Don't be discouraged if your list shrinks dramatically. Many wise people have said that a person is blessed if they have just 4 or 5 true friends. Some of you may not be able to think of someone in your life that you could call a true friend. I was in that position when I was in 7th grade. I was surrounded by people I really thought were my friends and I really tried to be accepted by them, but when it came down to it they didn't care about me much. When God started turning my life in a new direction, He brought some true friends into my life. These were people that not only cared about me deeply, but I also cared about them deeply. They are still my true friends today, even though we are apart. Friends don't come easy. When you find them, work to keep them. If you don't have any, try being a true friend and you might make a true friend.
